Across the Web consumers annually share double the information they did the year before. Use of smartphones, wireless email, and other technologies is also growing exponentially. The U.S. government and businesses can do things that would have been impossible a few years ago. For example, the National Security Agency (NSA) can intercept and download electronic communications equivalent to the contents of the Library of Congress every six hours. Regulatory inaction and a lack of rules or laws to regulate these practices allows more activity and potentially invasions of our privacy to happen faster and at a larger scale. Regulatory and government responses have been slow, ineffective, or non-existent. The Supreme Court recently declined to address whether the police can electronically track citizens with a GPS device and declined to examine whether texting is private. Calling two-way pagers, an emerging technology, Congress has not updated decades-old privacy legislation and not reacted to what two Senators call secret interpretations of the USA PATRIOT Act. Regulatory agencies have sought trivial concessions and non-financial settlements with companies charged with breaking the law. Meanwhile, leaders struggle to grasp technology; internet users struggle to grasp privacy decisions and trade-offs; and election-focused politicians prefer solving problems to preventing them. In this paper, I review these problems while advancing a framework for determining when a legal or social response to a privacy threat is needed. I also argue that privacy is an important societal value crucial to growing as individuals and creating relationships. I claim we should prioritize privacy threats of three types: law-breaking if laws are insufficiently enforced; and when laws or practices subvert valued social expectations of privacy. As such, we need better laws and precedents and better enforcement. I apply this framework and point out specific areas for change.
