Islam Buddhism Hinduism and Judaism Together they demonstrate that although worldviews might vary substantially there are concurrences across religious and non religious perspectives on happiness that provide a common ground for further cross cultural and interreligious exploration What the book makes clear is that happiness is not a static or monolithic category It is an ongoing process of being and becoming striving and seeking living ethically and meaningfully as well as arriving at a tranquil state of being This multifaceted volume makes a fresh contribution to the contemporary study of happiness and is valuable reading for scholars and students from religious studies and theology including those interested in interreligious dialogue and the psychology of religion as well as positive psychology Canadian Periodical Index ,1993 author argues that history has a relationship with one of the so called civilizations of the world that borders on the incestuous. That civilization is Western Civilization history has both emerged from it and helped to shape it in such a way that they are inextricably linked. History with its Western conceptual framework has become a defining part of Western Civilization to the extent that the West cannot even conceive of itself being without history. But what happens when history is removed from its natural habitat? Can it be done and has it been done other than on the terms of the West? The real issue therefore concerns all those societies and peoples outside the West who in accordance with the Hegelian tradition have traditionally been labeled as without history. What does it mean exactly not to have history? The reconstruction of the pasts of peoples without history poses a tremendous challenge to the science of history especially at the conceptual level. Finn Fuglestad not only believes that there has been a failure to confront this challenge properly but he also questions whether anything can really be done.
