SCIENCE AND HISTORY CONNECTION

Three Theories of the Solar System

Scientists have proposed three different theories that describe how the solar system formed.

In the condensation theory, the solar system formed from a cloud of gas and dust called a nebula. The nebula collapsed under its own gravity, and the center became so hot that the gas and dust began to form a protostar. The protostar became the sun, and the remaining gas and dust formed the planets.

Another theory is the capture theory. This theory says that the planets were captured by the sun. It says that the sun was passing through a cloud of gas and dust, and the planets were captured by its gravity. The planets were then pulled into orbits around the sun. This theory is supported by the fact that some planets have unusual orbits, and some have moons that are not in the same plane as the planet's orbit.

The tidal theory says that the solar system formed from a different part of the galaxy. It says that a passing star came close to the sun, and the gravity of the passing star pulled some of the sun's material away. This material then formed the planets.

Scientists have also proposed a theory that says that the solar system formed from a cloud of gas and dust that was pulled together by gravity. This theory is supported by the fact that the planets have similar compositions, and that the sun is made of the same material as the planets.
