The present study was designed to investigate the effects of a 12-week training program on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged men. The study was conducted in a laboratory setting and involved a random assignment of participants to either a control group or a training group. The control group remained sedentary throughout the study, while the training group engaged in a structured exercise program consisting of aerobic and resistance training. The primary outcome measures included changes in body composition, cardiovascular fitness, and psychological well-being. Secondary measures included changes in blood pressure, cholesterol levels, and quality of life. The study was conducted over a 12-week period, with baseline measurements taken at the beginning and follow-up measurements taken at the end of the program.

The results of the study showed that the training group experienced significant improvements in body composition, cardiovascular fitness, and psychological well-being compared to the control group. Specifically, the training group showed a decrease in body fat percentage, an increase in maximal oxygen consumption (VO₂max), and a reduction in symptoms of depression and anxiety. Additionally, the training group showed improvements in blood pressure and cholesterol levels, and an overall increase in quality of life. These findings suggest that a 12-week training program can have beneficial effects on the physical and psychological health of sedentary, middle-aged men.
