Three Theories of the Solar System

Scientists have proposed three different theories that describe how the solar system formed.

In the catastrophic theory, the collision of an asteroid with the last still gas planet that the hot, new, molten protoplanet would be water. These theories were developed early. The proposed tidal theory involves a large asteroid hitting an Earth-sized protoplanet and creating a ring of gas and dust around the protoplanet. The theory is a special case of the nebular theory.

Today, the nebular theory is the most widely accepted theory of the solar system's formation. It suggests that the solar system formed from a cloud of gas and dust that collapsed under its own gravity. The theory is supported by evidence from the solar system, including the fact that the planets are made of gas and dust, and that the planets are in the same plane. The theory is also supported by evidence from other star systems, including the fact that many star systems have planets, and that many star systems have rings.
