Microbial Interactions Across Species: Shaping Pathogenesis, Symbiosis, and Ecosystem Dynamics Jong Hyun Ham, Bryan Swingle, Marco Aurélio Siqueira Gama, Gregg Pettis, 2026-03-19 Microbiology investigates the complexities of interactions among different microbial species and their higher eukaryotic hosts encompassing a broad spectrum of dynamics such as competition cooperation and symbiosis While significant insights have come from studies focusing on pure cultures these fail to fully represent the intricate web of interspecies and inter kingdom communications present in natural ecosystems Particularly underexplored are the interspecific communications that occur between different microbial taxa and between microorganisms and eukaryotic hosts which play critical roles in pathogenic symbiotic and ecosystem interactions Traditional research often limits its focus to within species signaling overlooking the potential influences and regulatory mechanisms exerted by neighboring organisms This Research Topic aims to deepen our understanding of the mechanisms and outcomes of microbial interspecies communication in their natural environments which hold key implications for pathogenesis symbiosis and ecosystem dynamics By exploring microbial interactions at and beyond the interspecies level this topic seeks to uncover new insights into microbial behavior in natural settings thereby enhancing our grasp of their roles in ecological functions and various biological interactions including competition cooperation and predation The contributions to this topic will broaden our knowledge base in microbial ecology and bio interactions providing significant advancements in microbial biology across diverse ecosystems To gather further insights in the realm of interspecific and inter kingdom microbial interactions we welcome articles addressing but not limited to the following themes

- o Studies of cellular dynamics revealing microbial behavior in response to other microorganisms or host cells
- o Multi omics approaches to unravel complex cellular responses during interspecific microbial interactions
- o Molecular genetics research identifying key genes involved in interspecies communication and their mechanisms
- o Biochemical and molecular biology studies focused on signaling pathways that mediate interspecies communication
- o Investigations into the ecological impacts of antibiotics or other agents on interspecies microbial interactions

Article Types This Research Topic invites contributions in the form of Original Research Review and Perspective articles covering the above themes
