Neonatal Outcomes - What About Sex, Race(ism) And Social Determinants of Health? Rachana Singh, Krithika Lingappan, Hudson Santos, 2025-12-08 While the majority of newborns are born healthy at term gestational age with the advancement of medical surgical interventions in neonatal care many newborns have complex disorders at birth with the potential for long term neuro developmental deficits These are seen in the increased survival of pre term infants with associated complications of pre term birth as well as term infants with congenital medical and surgical disorders There is some growing evidence that variations in neonatal outcomes cannot be solely explained by the illness severity and clinical interventions There are additional factors in play that can potentially have a negative impact and identifying some modifiable risk factors could help in mitigating the inequities in outcomes Also knowing well that race is a social construct it is very commonly reported in ongoing studies and can lead to biases in care provision Currently there is a limited body of literature highlighting the influences of neonatal sex race ism and maternal Social Determinants of Health SDoH on neonatal outcomes It is a common adage in pediatrics that male infants will have a relatively poor outcome compared to female infants but the why is still unanswered Historically race has been tied in with health outcomes sending an erroneous message with a huge impact on care provision to people of color and minorities Lastly disparities in accessing healthcare based on one s socioeconomic status and the neighborhood one lives in are documented for adults and children We would like to identify the scientific rationale about the role infant sex plays how we can eliminate race ism as influencing outcomes and how we can effectively address SDoH related modifiable factors by early identification and creating public health policies to support the families and newborns affected by it We would like to invite original research as well as review articles focusing on these 3 factors sex race ism as well as SDoH These could be either focus on the existing evidence or well thought out pieces on how to best identify address both the modifiable SDoH as well as non modifiable sex race ism factors in the context of outcomes for infants at high risk Advocacy pieces as well as possible public health policy pieces would be also welcomed
