Case Study – United States of America

Lisa D. Rotz and Marcelle Layton

Abstract The United States (US) considers the intentional use of a biological agent a serious national security threat. Over the last decade, federal, state, and local governments in the US have made concerted efforts to enhance preparedness within the public health, medical, and emergency response systems to address this threat. These activities span a wide range of areas from the enactment of new legal authorities and legislative changes to significant financial investments to enhance multiple detection and response system capabilities and the adoption of a national command and control structure for response. Many of these investments, although prompted by the concern for bioterrorism, have served to strengthen public health, medical, and emergency response systems overall and have proven invaluable in responses to other large-scale emergencies, such as the 2009 H1N1 influenza pandemic.

18.1 Public Health Infectious Disease Threats

Infectious diseases still account for a significant portion of public health activities in the United States, whether it is monitoring for and responding to foodborne related outbreaks, addressing increases in nosocomial or antibiotic resistant infections, or tackling new and emerging world-wide infectious threats such as Severe Acute Respiratory Syndrome (SARS) or pandemic influenza. Indeed, infectious diseases still account for two of the ten leading causes of death in the United States [5].
