Abstract

In Ethiopia, land is the main economic, political, social and cultural asset. It is the crucial source of generating livelihood income for society. It remains an asset that farmers have to accumulate wealth and transfer the same to future generation. Rural farmers and pastoralists are guaranteed a plot of land free of charge while urban residents can secure the same through ground lease arrangements. Thus, this paper aimed to review the state of land expropriation and compensation payment in Ethiopia. Expropriation occurs when a public agency (for example, the provincial government and its agencies, regional districts, municipalities, school boards and utilities) takes property for a purpose deemed to be in the public interest, even though the owner of the property may not be willing to sell it. Thus, land expropriation to the periphery is aggravated by development projects such as industry, infrastructure, communication and road networks. Displacement due to land expropriation is more significant issue in developing countries than developed countries because, the majority of the people in developing countries live highly concentrated in the periphery depending on agriculture with fragmented land holdings. This is common in countries like Ethiopia where land remains government's property and amount of compensation paid depends on government's decision. The urban land lease policy is not very friendly to rural households land in general and the poor land holders in particular. The policy implementation process has not taken in to account the life of rural peasants living in vicinity of cities. As a result, the implementation of the policy has been marginalizing the rural settled peasant communities. The non-farm based economic sector was not able to absorb those displaced farmers, as most of them are unskilled labour. Thus, Land expropriation and compensation issues takes more policy and implementation emphasis.

1. Introduction

In rural residents of most developing countries, including Ethiopia, land is the main economic, political, social and cultural asset. It is the crucial source of generating livelihood income for society. It remains an asset that farmers have to accumulate wealth and transfer the same to future generation. Moreover, the issue of land has not simply remained to be an economic affair but also it is very much intertwined with the people's culture and identity. In a nutshell, land related issues in developing countries are the most sensitive part of overall development that government needs to consider (Girma, 2011).

In Ethiopia, land is the common property of the 'state and the people', and, hence, is not subject to sale, exchange or mortgage. Rural farmers and pastoralists are guaranteed a plot of land free of charge while urban residents can secure the same through ground lease arrangements. Rural farmers' right to the land is a kind of usufruct right, which merely gives peasants possessory or "holding" prerogatives, including the rights to use and enjoy, rent, donate and inherit the land. In urban areas, its dwellers may obtain land on 15-99 years lease agreements depending on the purpose for which the land is needed and such right may be freely transferable (Ibid).

Expropriation occurs when a public agency takes property for a purpose deemed to be in the public interest, even though the owner of the property may not be willing to sell it (BC-ECB, 1996). They also claimed that when the owner does not agree to sell the property to the public agency, either because of the amount of money offered, or for some other reasons, the law might authorize the agency to expropriate the land. Thus, one can argue that many rural people will soon face crises in their livelihood and expose to social and economic problems if the land expropriation continues to the periphery.

Eminent domain (Expropriation) refers to the power possessed by the state over all property within the state, specifically its power to appropriate private property for public use. The Governments therefore have the right of compulsory land acquisition, with compensation, for the broader public service (Deininger, 2003). However, as Kotey (2002: 203) has noted, the exercise of such power is not without controversy. The way in which many developing countries governments exercise this right, especially for urban expansion, undermines tenure security, and because often little or no compensation is paid, also has negative impacts on equity and transparency (Deininger, 2003). The effect is that there is massive encroachment by expropriated owners.

With the development of national construction and the boost of urbanization, the expropriation of country's collective land becomes necessary. At the same time, problems on the compensation to the land-lost farmers, the resettlements, the allocation of land's income and abuse expropriation are getting more and more
