In the ancient history of the Christian era, the empire of Rome comprehended the largest part of the world, and the most civilized part of mankind. The extent of this extensive monarchy, since extended by various conquests and alliances, was the greatest, which any monarch of that, and perhaps any preceding century, ever possessed. The number of its provinces, and the number of its subjects, exceeded that of all other monarchies, and its power and influence were almost boundless.

Successive years, the public administration was conducted by the virtue and abilities of Scipio, Trajan, Hadrian, and the two Antonines. It is the design of this and of the two succeeding chapters, to describe the progressive condition of these empires, and afterwards, from the death of Marcus Aurelius, to discuss the most important circumstances of its decline and fall; a revolution which will ever be remembered, and is well felt by the nations of the earth. The principal conquests of the Romans were achieved under the republic; and the emperors, for the most part, were satisfied with preserving those dominions which had been acquired by the policy of the senate, the active emulation of the consuls, and the martial valour of the people. The seven first centuries were filled with a rapid succession of triumphs, but it was
