During the course of this mid-term, students were at the stage of comparing systems. This could be done through group work, where students could be divided into different groups and given a task to complete. This could be done by giving students the opportunity to compare their own work to that of others. This could be done by giving students the opportunity to compare their work to that of others.

It will be important to ensure that the students are able to compare their work to that of others. This could be done by giving students the opportunity to compare their work to that of others. This could be done by giving students the opportunity to compare their work to that of others.

1. The first part of the question asks you to identify the main components of a system. This is a simple task and can be done by looking at the diagram provided. The main components of a system are the input, the process, and the output. The input is the data that is fed into the system, the process is the work that is done on the data, and the output is the result of the work. The diagram shows a box with an arrow pointing into it from the left, labeled 'Input', and an arrow pointing out of it to the right, labeled 'Output'. Inside the box, there is a smaller box labeled 'Process'.
