Abstract

While the last 20 years have witnessed a rapid increase in computer applications in the workplace, the history of their use has often not been fully documented. This paper is devoted to the study of their use in the workplace in the province of Québec. The authors are pleased to present their findings from interviews of representatives from the public sector who share their views on the use of computers from their various workplaces. Interviews are also conducted with users of the public sector who are engaged in projects to reduce their dependence on external user support services. Interviews are conducted in the context of an ongoing research and training initiative in Québec on the challenges associated with applying information technology.
