Welding

Principles and Applications

Larry Jeffus

Welding is a process of joining materials, usually metals or thermoplastics, by using heat as a energy source to melt the workpieces together. The heat can be produced by a gas flame, an electric arc, laser, friction, or resistance to electrical current. The melted materials then fuse together to form a weld joint. Welding is a common manufacturing process used in a wide variety of industries, including construction, automotive, and aerospace.
