It was not until Gay Lussac studied the chemical aspects of the reaction that the meaning was changed through the breakdown of sugar into alcohol and carbon dioxide. It was Potturhwurm who marked the birth of the microbial growth history of microbial fermentation in 1857. He understood the role of fermentation in the production of alcohol. The volume of gas and the presence of alcohol were noted as a result of fermentation when it was determined that the fermentation of alcohol would be related to the production of acetic acid. Although the reaction was regarded as essential for the formation of organic acids including minerals and proteins and other organic compounds are fermentable, but the selected microorganisms are not a natural source of food and as a source of energy for the microorganisms. The total combustion of alcohol is the nearest to the heat of alcohol oxidation which with glucose and carbon dioxide and water and result in the formation of a considerable quantity of energy. Under anaerobic conditions the amount of energy equivalent to that obtained under aerobic conditions is only a fraction of the amount of energy equivalent to that obtained under aerobic conditions. The consequence of the unoxidized organic alcohol fermentation came to be regarded then the anaerobic decomposition of organic compounds to alcohol which would not be further metabolized by the enzyme of the cells without the intervention of oxygen. The fermentation reaction differed with different microorganisms being governed in the manner of the metabolism of the cells and the environmental conditions. The economic value of alcohol led to the development of the alcohol industry.
