- While satellite communications will probably never overtake terrestrial telecommunications on a major scale, these strengths can produce very effective niches in the marketplace.
- Once the satellite operator has placed the satellite into service, a network can easily be installed and managed on a national or regional basis by a single organization.
- The frequency allocations at C-, Ku-, and Ka-bands offer effective bandwidths of 1 GHz or more per satellite.
- L- and S- bands constrain bandwidth to less than 100 MHz but may propagate signals that bend around obstacles and penetrate nonmetallic structures.
