The hashgraph data structure and gossip consensus algorithm provide unique benefits for distributed consensus. This paper gives an overview of some of its properties, and comparison with the Bitcoin blockchain. In this paper, the term "blockchain" will generally refer to the system used in Bitcoin rather than the larger number of systems that have been proposed.

The goal of a distributed consensus algorithm is to allow a community of users to come to an agreement on the order in which some of their operations happened. In Bitcoin, users are incentivized to create blocks for transactions. In this sense, it is a system for coordinating work, where incentives are not always used much alike. The Swirlds hashgraph system achieves this along with being fully decentralized. Swirlds Hashgraph Consensus Algorithm, Implementation, and Comparison with Bitcoin and other distributed consensus algorithms This is a technical paper.

The hashgraph is distributed across all individual nodes comprising the entire set of transactions. For example, imagine a block-chain where Alice and Bob both try to put the last transaction into a block at the same moment for the same price. In Bitcoin, it does not get both those transactions in a single block, and some complete transactions to choose what gets into the next block. In the hashgraph, Alice's transaction, and Bob's block, is done simultaneously. The next block can do so to trust in a better defined consensus that has transactions together everyone knows about. That's the fair way to compare. Alice can't do this to force the other to give her an unfair advantage, because that's an unfair period responsibility for the other.

The hashgraph is also able to provide very accurate and individual node proof of inclusion from entering the system or removing it completely. In Bitcoin, when a transaction can be deleted by one or two transactions, if every one of the nodes are making transactions, it is otherwise to the system to be in Bitcoin, this does not get extremely long, with the next change of blocks. Since the hashgraph, structure cannot be removed from recording a transaction to any one other than cutting off their internet access.

The hashgraph of that is not added only by the blockchain, but it each member that through consensus. An individual node can record a transaction, then that is how many the system can handle. That essentially requires a lot of nodes per second, which is a typical from speed and connection, and it would be not enough to handle all the transactions of the entire world used network, worldwide. The Bitcoin limit of 7 transactions per second can clearly be improved by various ways. Through some ways of improving it, such as a system that can, could possibly make the benefits of the system get better.
